ENVIRONMENTAL EDUCATION RESEARCH

Volume 11, Issue 3, 2005 Special Issue: Free-choice Learning and the Environment

- Environmental education has a history of struggling with language around the learning outcomes of the field. Two of the concepts that are perhaps most historically contentious are those of life-span learning, and the contexts in which learning takes place. The use of the construct of free-choice learning provides a meaningful framework to redefine what learning about the environment and in the environment can be. This special issue, part of a Free-choice Learning and the Environment initiative, is designed to create forums which will spark discussion, debate and consideration through its presentation of papers representing the bigger picture of free-choice learning.
